Field visits

Field visits will be a way to address the issue of homophobic hate crime in a way that is different from sitting in a conference room. The trip will take participants to the area of Borisova Gardens park, a site of the 2008 murder of Mihail Stoyanov (see below). During the trip, the facilitator will describe the case and speak of Stoyanov's legacy today.

The murder of Mihail Stoyanov

The 25-year old medicine student Mihail Stoyanov was murdered in 2008 in Borisova Gardens Park in Sofia, which is a cruising area. In 2010, two young men were arrested as suspects. In their testimony to the police, they admitted that they were “clearing the park from gays” and were regularly assaulting gay men meeting there. The two defendants were found guilty on 13.07.2017 by the Sofia Appellate Court, and the latter ruled that their initial verdicts from June 2015 have been unreasonably diminished. In the motives of its decision, the Sofia Appellate Court recognized – for the first time - the anti-gay motive of the crime, stating that the perpetrators were driven not by hooligan motives, but by strong and unreasonable hate against the victim's perceived identity and their own feeling of superiority over those they consider to be different. (Appellate Court Sofia, Decision № 330/12.072017 r. on appeal, criminal case of general nature № 84/2016 r.)
